Nature and Humanity (From Lines Composed Near Tintern Abbey.")

By WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

coarser pleasures of my boylsh days, their gind animal movements all gone by) me was all in all.—I cannot paint I then I was. The sounding cateract uted me like a passion: the tall rock, mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood, r colors and their forms, were then to me opportise; a feeling and a love, had no need of a remoter charm, hought supprised, nor any interest growed from the eye.—That time is past, all its ach as joya are now no more, on from the eye — that time is past to acknow love are now no more, as there invested to this so would not manufact other gifts or d. for such low, I would believe, recombence. For I have learned a nature, not as in the hour lieus routh, but hearing oftentimes and finishe of humanity. minate of humanity, a grating, shough of ample power to cobine. And I have felt to the term with the joy benghist a sense sublime for more decply interfused to the thich or setting suns, d ocean and the lights all, solve, and in the mind of man: a spirit, that impels him shall objects of all thought, such all things. Therefore am I still to down and the woods, to all things and the woods to said of all that we behold on earth; of all the mighty world to both what they half create, the language of the sense.
